

In the airing of "Stolen Honor" by Sinclair immediately preceding the election, Sinclair is using public airwaves for political purposes without either providing equivalent airtime for the opposition or requiring the campaign it is assisting to pay market rate for its services. This is an unacceptable abuse of public property, and it is well outside of the first amendment rights of the broadcasting corporation. It also seems to go against the spirit, if not also the letter, of campaign finance reform laws. The FCC should prevent this abuse of public airwaves from happening.
